This is one of the most popular traditional games in Korea. Family members or friends get together to play it during the New Year holidays and important family or village events. To play it you need four sticks, the board, and some markers. Each of the sticks has a flat side and a round side. The board has a lot of points and the route for the markers. Players throw the sticks and let (A)them fall. Then they move a marker along the route based on a certain number of points given for how the sticks land. It can be played by two or three players or sometimes two or three teams. Different players or teams use different markers, usually in different colors. Usually two or three markers for each player or team are used for one round of the game. The winner is the player or the team who brings all of the markers home first.

Instead of just reading one blog, why don't you read multiple blogs from kids around the world? The blog hosted by National Geographic Kids pulls in the most recent posts from kid bloggers the world over. Bloggers are selected and monitored by NG Kids. Although all the blogs are in the English language, that doesn't seem to limit the locations kids can report from. See what different kids eat, what languages they speak, what games they play and find out about their hometowns. The blog also hosts contests, so be sure to check back regularly to see the latest. We'd recommend this blog to you.

The many languages spoken around the world can be a serious obstacle to global culture. To avoid such difficulties, we use pictograms to express specific meanings. Although they are understood by people across all the cultures of the world, they all need understanding and interpretation. (A), the international pictograms for male and female restrooms show a man with trousers and a woman with a skirt. This is generally accepted. But women in many other cultures often wear trousers, and in some other countries men wear skirts. (B), the wheelchair symbol is universally recognized, but many disabled people do not use wheelchairs. These pictograms may not be perfect, but their worldwide acceptance is an important part of global culture.

People need to be active to be healthy. Our modern lifestyle and all the conveniences we've become used to have made us ㉠inactive — and that's dangerous for our health. Sitting around in front of the TV or the computer, riding in the car for even a short trip to the store and using elevators instead of stairs all contribute to our ㉡inactivity. Increase your activities during the day by periods of ㉢at most 10 minutes each. Start slowly and build up. A little is good, but ㉣more is better if you want to achieve health benefits. Physical activity doesn't have to be very hard to improve your health. This goal can be reached by building physical activities into your daily routine. Just ㉤increase them by periods of at least ten minutes each throughout the day. After three months of regular physical activity, you will notice a difference—people often say getting started is the hardest part.
